Lecture Highlights :

The speaker initiated the lecture by quoting Eleanor Roosevelt that The purpose of life is to live it, to taste experience to the utmost, to reach out eagerly and without fear for newer and richer experience.

He followed the quote with discussion on finding ways to make the most of experiences. He told the students that as humans we ascribe value to the things we do, and it's understandable. We like to feel that what we are doing has purpose. It's important to find fulfillment in our relationships and careers. He advised students to cultivate friendships and find company cultures that fulfill . It's from those experiences in life that they are likely to help learn and grow.

He told the students that they might stumble and fall, and that's okay. He quoted his life whereby he said that he had taken jobs that he shouldn't have and moved for the wrong reasons. Though that time spent may seem like a waste, he learned a lot from those experiences. It takes time to gain confidence in yourself. It takes time to learn how to stand on your own. Building connections and making friends is a process like anything else. He concluded the session advising the students that they might fail sometimes, but they'll learn new ways to achieve goals in the process.
